

Individuals most suited to the reThinking unEmployment Program

- Individuals, who regardless of training, or “advice” or information, continuously repeat “problems”. This includes those who have not learned or changed from prior experiences
- Individuals who fail to recognize that they have problems
- Individuals who are unmotivated, do not recognize what changes need to be made, or how to make required personal changes
- Individuals who are significantly angry or depressed over their future
- Individuals resisting actively or passively further non-medical rehabilitation efforts
- Individuals who have negative working relationships with rehabilitation professionals. With others generally, and specifically with those in authority – instead of trying to work together
- Individuals with a history of repeat unemployment
- Individuals with negative experience in previous job, co-worker or boss conflicts (if they have worked before)
- Individual who is essentially at core of most of his/her problems – instrumental in causing many problems but never recognizes that, or even acknowledges that they have problems. “Everything is someone else’s fault” – defensive, anti-social responses
- Individuals who lack team work skills, poor interpersonal relationships
- Individuals who have a limited acceptance of personal responsibility
- Individuals with limited follow through on rehabilitation plans
- Individuals who justify actions (incorrect, or anti-social) – argues irrationally and /or illogically
- Individuals who have problems with others in the program. Everything is “them”, “they”, never “me” or “I”
- Individuals who say they want employment, believe in it and yet act in contrary ways

Three or more of these indicators will recommend an individual to the reThinking unEmployment Program.
